

Depressions and Channels on the Floor of Lyot Crater

ESP_052628_2310

On the crater's floor, we see a network of channels connecting a series of irregular shaped pits. These resemble terrestrial beaded streams, which are common in the Arctic regions of Earth and develop from uneven permafrost thawing. If terrestrial beaded streams are a good analog, these landforms suggest liquid water flow in the past.

