

Dry Ice Gone Wild

This particular example shows eroded channels filled with bright ice, in contrast to the muted red of the underlying ground. In the summer the ice will disappear into the atmosphere, and we will see just the channels of ghostly spiders carved in the surface. This is truly Martian terrain—this type of erosion does not take place anywhere naturally on Earth because our climate is too warm.