

Banded Ridges in Hellas

Low lying areas in the Hellas region--which is the largest impact basin on Mars--often show complex groups of banded ridges, furrows, and pits. These sorts of bands suggest that the surface material has flowed and twisted viscously like taffy. The orientation of the ridges and groups of ridges would then point in the direction of the flow, called stream lines.