

A Big Block of Red Bedrock

This image covers a 26-kilometer-wide impact crater northeast of the Hellas impact basin. The crater exposes large blocks of bedrock (called “megabreccia”) in both the central uplift and in the walls of the crater. These blocks could be ejecta from the ancient Hellas impact or other large impacts from billions of years ago.