

A Meandering Channel on Hellas' Rim

The central portion of this image features a mildly-winding depression that was carved by water, likely around four billion years ago shortly after the Hellas basin formed following a giant asteroid or comet impact. Water would have flowed from the uplands (to the east [right]) and drained into the low-lying basin, carving river channels as it flowed.