

A Crater on the South Polar Layered Deposits

This image is part of a campaign to image potential impact craters in the south polar layered deposits (ice cap). This feature looks like a strong candidate for an impact crater because it is very circular and still has a raised rim. (NASA/JPL/University of Arizona, less than 1 km across.)

uahirise.org/ESP_058600_0990

