

A Martian Game Board

The many bumps are sand dunes less than 100 meters across that are mostly covered by seasonal frost, appearing in a manner that looks artificial but is a natural consequence of the wind patterns in this region. The smaller, darker spots are places where the seasonal frost has sublimated away, exposing the dark surface below. The combination of these features makes for an unearthly scene! (NASA/JPL/University of Arizona)

uahirise.org/ESP_060791_2550

