

Better Preserved on Mars than on Earth

ESP_014096_1975

HiRISE
HIGH RESOLUTION IMAGING
SCIENCE EXPERIMENT
UAHIRISE.ORG

LPL
Lunar & Planetary Laboratory

Mars has better preserved craters than ones on Earth because of the geological activity of our planet. On Mars, we can study impact craters and central peaks, like this one in an unnamed, 20-kilometer crater that contains abundant fragmental bedrock called “breccia.” The geological relationships here suggest that these breccias include ones formed by the host crater, and others formed from numerous impacts in the distant past.

