

Rippled Surfaces on a Slope in Coloe Fossae

ESP_033599_2160

This observation shows us a set of landforms that appears to form a nested "chevron" pattern on a slope in Coloe Fossae. Interestingly, nearby surfaces on the same slope are all parallel. How do these form? Are they bedforms created by the wind? Why do some slopes have these features and others do not?