

Lace on Mars

ESP_046414_0990

HIRISE
HIGH RESOLUTION IMAGING
SCIENCE EXPERIMENT
UAHIRISE.ORG

LPL
Lunar & Planetary Laboratory

Some seasonal ice on Mars is transparent so that the sunlight penetrates to the bottom of the ice. Heat from this sunlight can turn the ice directly into a gas in a process called sublimation and this gas can scour channels in the loose dirt under the ice. Channels formed by sublimation of a layer of seasonal dry ice are so dense in this area that they look like lace.

